Paper Title: A Hybrid Approach for Predictive Waste Classification and Resource Optimization using Deep Transfer Learning and Reinforcement Learn

Abstract:
The fast increasing quantity of waste produced in the world today is an environmental sustainability and resource efficiency crisis. Conventional waste management strategies are not working since they are inefficiently sorting and losing materials, with additional pollution, loss of resources, and ad ditional environmental burdens. The objective of this study is to develop an AI model with Transfer Learning and Reinforcement Learning to address such issues. Transfer Learning improves the performance of waste classification in various classes in the scenario of limited labeled samples through the use of pre-trained deep learning models. Reinforcement Learning is, however, utilized to design learning-based optimization strategies that make intelligent decisions in dynamic environments of waste treatment. Apart from minimizing human intervention requirements, the approach also offers real-time learning, auto optimization, and ongoing waste treatment process tuning. The system uses feedback loops and sensor-streamed data to optimize sorting efficiency and best possible recovery of resources. The sys tem is scalable and can be integrated rather simply into various urban and industrial environments to make them sustainable in the long term. More generally, the study enables smarter, greener, and more effective urban systems and the circular economy by enhancing waste management through being more efficient, intelligent, and ecological.
